 SHORT STORY OF THE DAY.

* A MODERN MIND WAVE.

Kate Masterson, in In Door and Out. Dolores was reading a queer book; an Dolores was one of those higher educated girls who had learned all sorts of things at college, and even she thought it queer. The chapter which she was reading was all about "Mind Waves." and how the brain sent out currents that vibrated like sound, only one couldn't see or hear them. There were even pictures, showing alarming heads, with brains exposed and dotted lines to show just how the mind waves worked. Then there were like stories in fine print, telling how one could train the mine o send messages to the mind of another person over the invisible current. There was one especially interesting which told how a man who had been in love with a woman for seven years, without he suspecting it, finally brought her to New York all the way from India on one of his mind currents.

Dolores wondered if she could utilize the theory in her own case. You see, Dolotes was in love, or thought she was, which is as near it as lots of people get. She had met a man two months ago at a dance and he and Dolores had sat out on the stairs, and talked and danced once or twice th each other, and the queerest part of was that he hadn't seemed to want to

A college town gives a girl some odd Ideas.

They had been sensible in their talk. He had told her a lot about football, and had given her points on the new style of play, and explained the signals, and all that sort of thing; and Dolores had listened to him and said; "How interesting!" and had waited patiently for him to look soulfully into her eyes, and ask her for a rose or something.

something.

But he hadn't looked or asked.

Now she had been home in Washington for eight weeks. He was in New York. She found that she could not get the man out of her mind. She thought of him so persistently that it had become annoying. The thoughts were most vague, relating to his whereabouts, what he might be doing at a particular time, who were his friends, what were his amusements. But his "image." so to speak, was impressed upon her mind in a way which she could not understand, for she did not think of him as a girl thinks of a man she loves. not understand, for she did not think of him as a girl thinks of a man she loves. She simply thought, and wondered why she thought. What did it all mean? She could not be in love with a man she scarcely knew, except that he was of good family, and went about in the same set with the people she knew in New York.

It was ridiculous; it was in bad taste; it was silly, but it was something she seemed unable to control. She had often wished that she could hear something about himsomething bad, which might make her hate him. He had become a sort of intellectual ghost, and to-day especially she had thought of him, and wondered, and wondered.

wondered.

You see, these tender, higher educated girls like to analyze their emotions, just as they cut up live kittens to watch the heart-beats. This was her thought just then and she was glad to find her mind going back to the classroom. And then she found herself thinking. Now, if this mind wave plan were true, she would simply set currents going, and he would come flying to ward her over space, time and everything. But then, why had they not done so before now? The mind wave theory must be wrong.

And then Table 16 the classification of the control o wrong.

And then. Well, if the mind wave worked all right—. She went over to the mirror, looked into the reflection of her own eyes—pretty eyes they were, too—and laughed early.

again.

Just then a thing happened. A telephone bell rang out in the hall, and Dolores ran out to answer it. She found one of her girl friends at the other end of the wire. This was the conversation:

"I had to call you up, Dol—to tell you—who do you think is engaged?"

"Which?"

"No! Who?"

"O, whom?"

A name came back—the name of another girl.

"Who is the man?"

"Who is the man?"

Dolores grew faint when she heard the answer. For she heard the name of the man of whom she had been thinking. She leaned heavily against the telephone, and fried to say, quite evenly:

"Yes—I met him. How did you hear about the company here, you say—here—the company here you say—the company it?"

"She just ran in to tell me to-night. The engagement won't be announced until next month, at a luncheon her mother is going to give. Of course you'll go?"

"Yes-I'll go. How long is he to be here?"

"All winter, I believe. They'll not be married until next year. I hear. They will have lots of dances, and dinners and things given them. I suppose, so we will have no end of fun."

"Yes-yes-when is he coming on to Washington, did you say?"

Dolores walked back to the corner where the mind wave book lay upon the floor. She picked it up carelessly, and held at against her heart. Then she walked up and against her hearf. Then she walked up and down the room.

"Something—had happened—which decided him to take the midnight train for Washington," she said; "and he telegraphed—and then I get word over the telephone that he is coming—right over the current!" She put the book carefully on a table. Then she looked in the glass again, and saw a smilling, triumphant face looking back at her. The cheeks were blazing.
"Poor girl," she whispered softly to herself, "I'm sorry for her—if she really cares for him!"
